Life is full of moments that can knock us off our center or change the course we thought we were on. It can feel lonely out on the big waves but doesn't have to.

Catalyze a Conversation

Jennifer Lyn Simpson, Ph.D., is an alchemist of social and organizational transformation. For more than thirty years she has guided leaders, teams, and communities through change, weaving nature-based practice and contemplative wisdom together with the science of how humans get their best work done. She has designed and led immersive experiences for tens of thousands of people across four continents over more than two decades.

Jen is the author of the KOAN method: Breakthrough Leadership for a Divided World, a way of living and leading through uncertainty and fostering networks of flourishing in the organizations and communities that form the fabric of our lives. She teaches organizational culture at the University of Colorado Boulder, where she earned her master's degree and doctorate in organizational communication. In decades of teaching and advising, she has always held scholarship and practice side by side. For many years she has participated in and guided nature-based leadership programs and integrates modern leadership science with ancient wisdom traditions across her many networks of impact to build bolder futures, together.
